ELECTION OF SENATORS.

United States senators by a direct at the election held in this state on vote of the people, and the reasons for it are not hard to find. The senate itself furnishes nearly all of the arguments and influences by which the desire for such a change is being strengthened and extended. It was the original design that this select and august body should be a conserva- the upbuilding of a home market, a tive force to check the excesses of the house and insure a temperate and prudent adjustment of all controversies; and for a long time it served that purpose in a beneficial and satisfactory way. the public interests. The people are very tired of this constant abuse of legislative authority, and very anxious to put a stop to it. Possibly the proposed change in the method of election would not accomplish the desired improvement, by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. but the impression widely prevails There is only one way to cure deaf that the experiment is worth trying, at any rate. There is a feeling that if the men who seek election to the senate were required to submit their claims directly to the voters of a state, it would tend to increase the chances it would tend to increase the chances it would tend to increase the chauces of superior over inferior candidates, and to establish a better sense of responsibility on the part of those securing such places. It is true that there are certain forcible objections to the change from a theoretical point of view, but public sentiment does not culars free.

So many men have obtained seats in the senate who could not have been elected by a popular the five city precincts of Salem on vote that it is easy to believe that the Saturday, March 7, 1896. trouble lies in the opportunity which the present method affords for trickery and corruption to beat honest merit. The matter is not one to be decided in an impulsive way or under pressure of special causes of dissatisfaction; but it is a proper one to be discussed in all of its aspects, and there are unmistakable indications that the idea of election by a direct vote is gaining ground rapidly in all parts of the country and among all classes of the people. - St. Louis Globe-Democrat (Rep.).
